This convention is the story of one woman. Ok, there are probably more stories than just this one, but I only have space to tell this one story.

For our first four years, this convention was a six-hour one day vendor fair, the kind labeled “Teeny Tiny Con” by a local blogger, and the crack registration department was staffed by relatives of volunteers, one of those including the aforementioned woman.

She helped not because she was a big geek herself, though she had seen the Star Trek movies and she watched Heroes. She helped because of her love for me as her brother.

When we expanded this convention to multiple days in 2006, this woman, having now retired from the registration staff, said she would attend the show. I figured that it would be a “hi-nice-con-we-really-must-go-going” type of visit that is over before it even begins.

But she stayed. All day. Each day. And she did the same the next three years.

And after each convention she approached me and started commentating on the panels she attended, what she learned, and talked about the guests she met and the graphic novels she purchased, and asked if those guests would be coming back next year so she could get the next volume in their series. One time, without prodding, she even cracked a Star Wars joke like a pro and I knew she could have only learned it “at the convention.”

Her story has a familiar refrain that we’ve seen in others. A volunteer helps because of a relative. A mother attends to chaperone her daughter and friends. A best friend attends with a group not really sure what this is all about. And all of them discover that they’re having a great time, meeting new friends, and being entertained.

Their stories, different in experience, similar in conclusion, is what makes all the work and effort of this convention great: us opening the doors to hobbies and entertainment that we so love and sharing it with others.

The single best quote I’ve ever heard about this convention comes from one of our guests, who asked to remain anonymous, so I’ll just say that his name rhymes with Wil Wheaton.

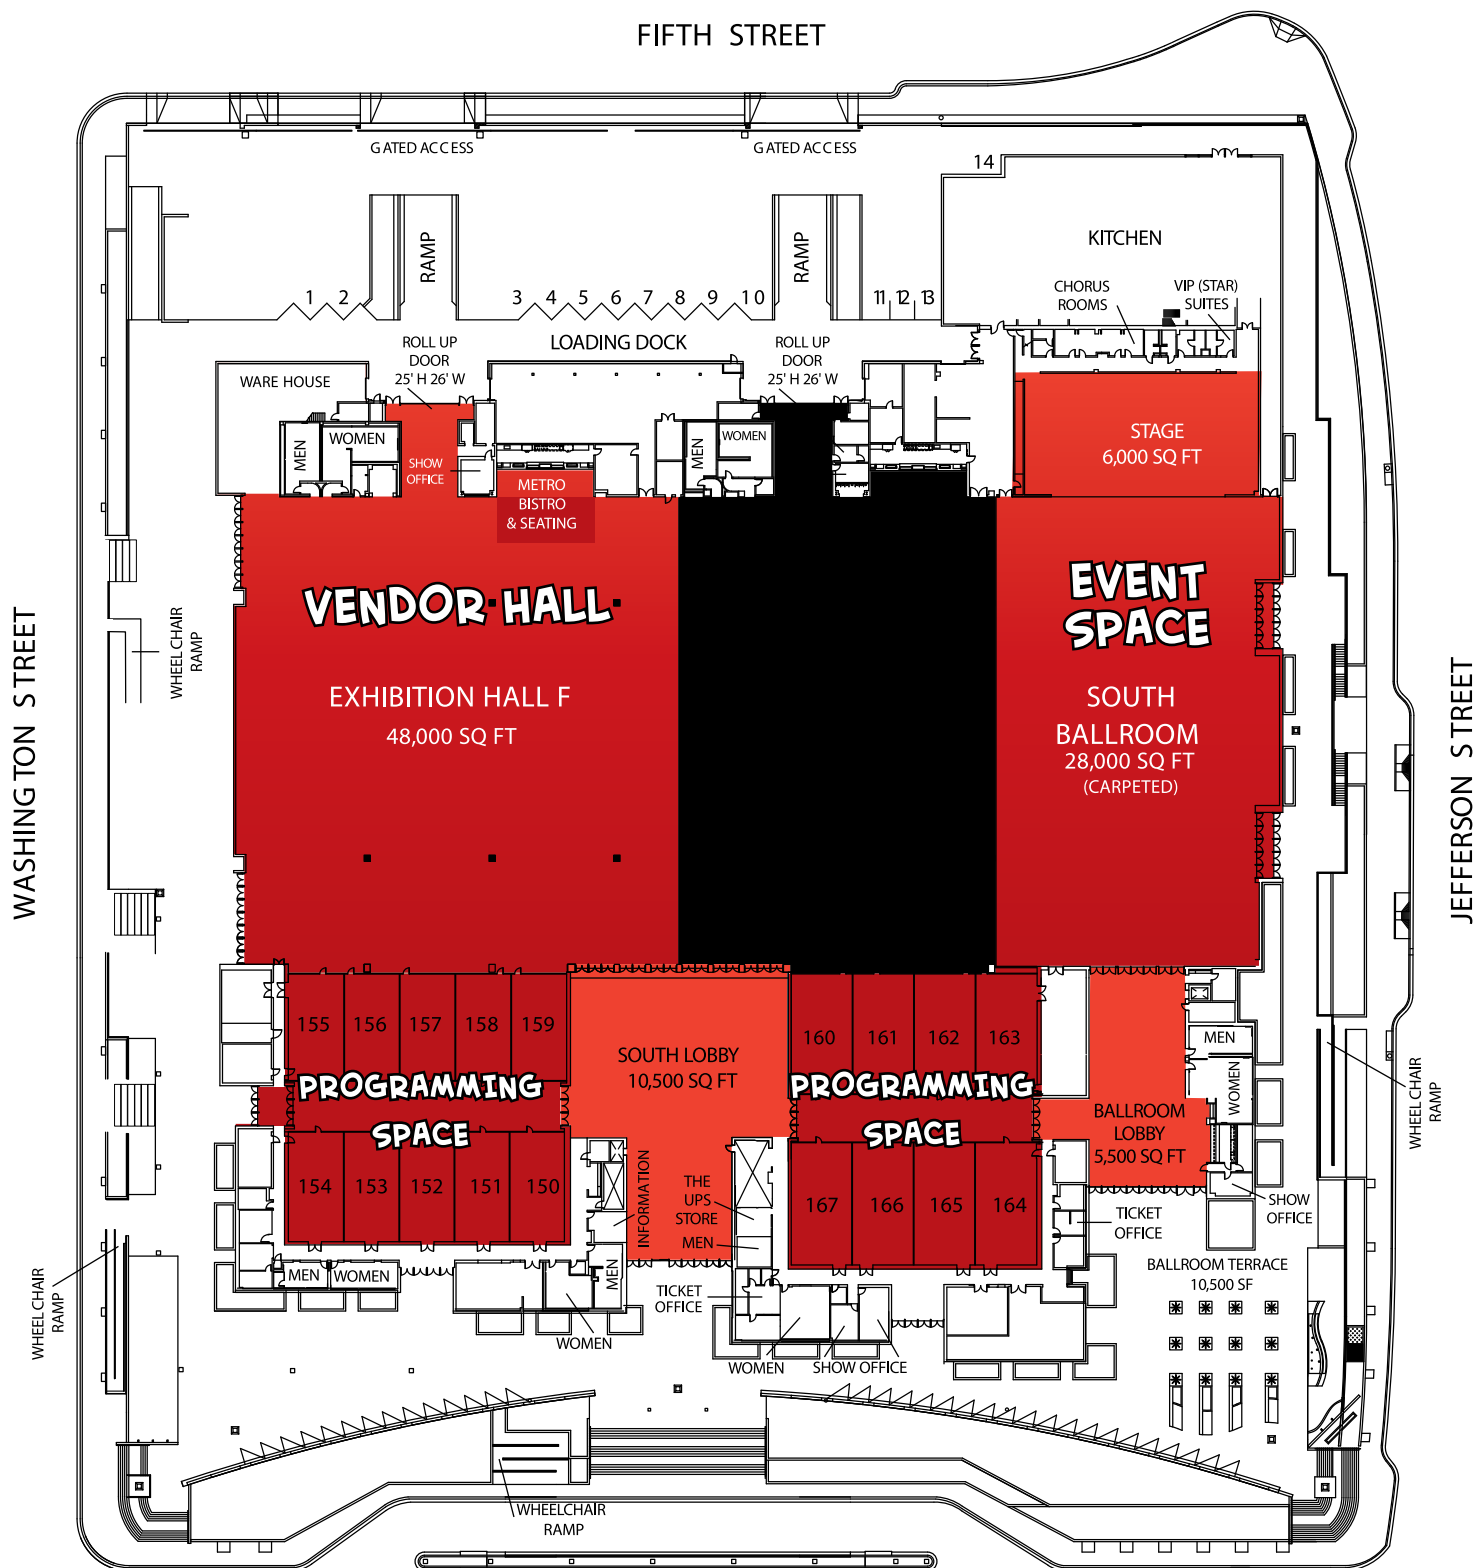

On his blog following an appearance, Wil said:

“This con was exactly like the cons I went to when I was a kid. This con ... reminded me what cons could and should be. There were families, couples young and old, hundreds of teenagers everywhere, all having a great time being geeks. And that’s the thing I love about cons: it’s not just accepted, it’s encouraged and it’s where I feel home.”

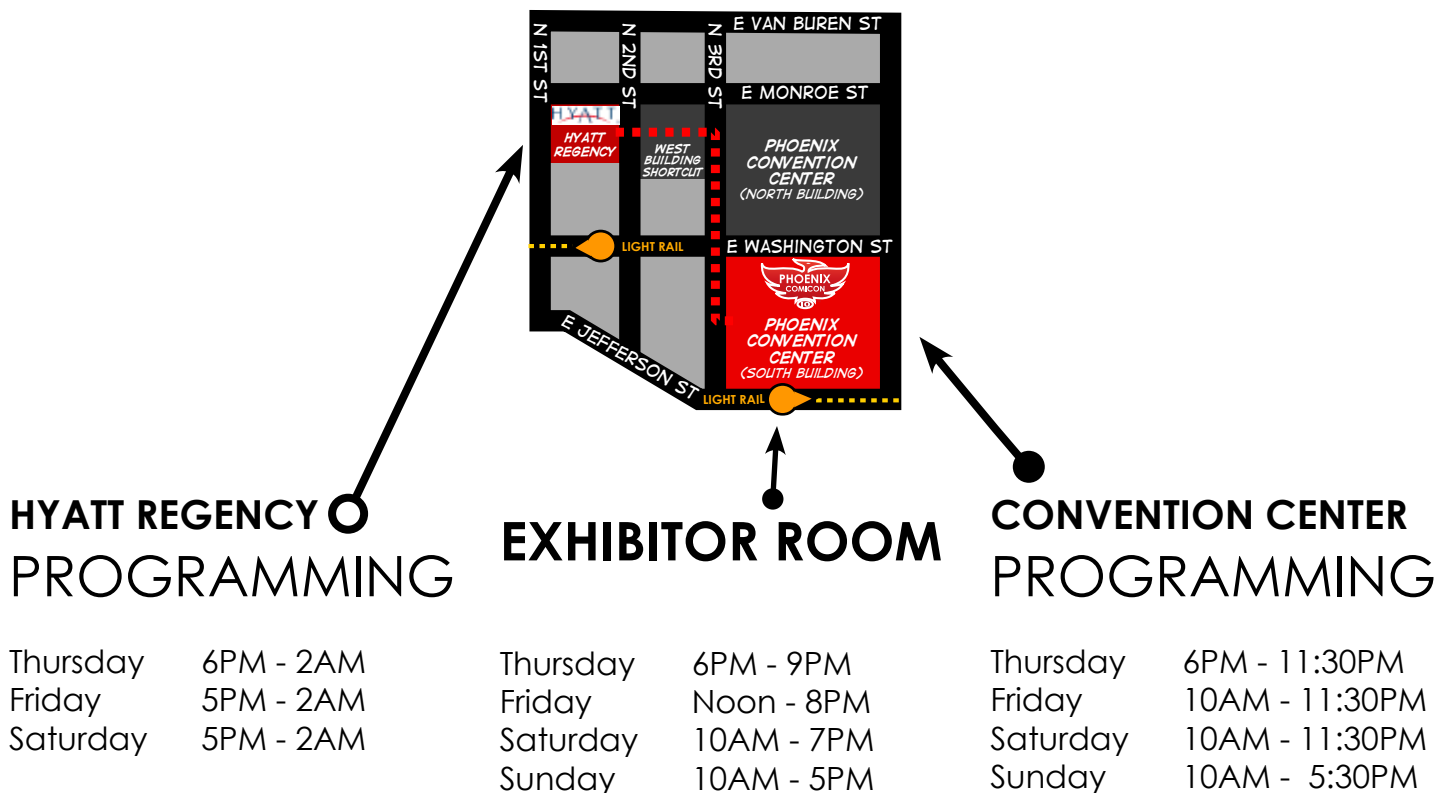

Esteemed attendees, our guests, friends, family, and fellow volunteers, on behalf of all of us at Phoenix Comicon –

Welcome home.

Matt Solberg
